ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL. Last every 3, when the Chicago train came in, an observer might have noticed an elderly gentleman, somewhat good-looking, somewhat full in the face, and stout, but consider a space of time very cars and follow. In a space of time very short for men to travel so far, the two might have been seen hastening to the might have been seen hastening to the speeches characterized all Mr. Stevens speeches characterized all Mr. Stevens of the Kirby House, both puffing efforts, even his latest.

LINEN AND steps of the Kiroy House, both paining so fast—the short man puffling so fast—the short man puffling the most—yet neither speaking to the other. The stout man was ahead a few seconds. His voice was lost he felt, but he found breath to ask, "Where is the proprietor?" and the query being answered by Mr. Webber pointing out a quiet-looking gentleman, who sat in conversation with another, the stout gentleman rushed up to the the stout gentleman rushed up to the ex-Mayor with the exclamation, "Where is my son, sir?"

The ex-Mayor was a little nonplussed. Two well dressed, good-looking, very

"But they are here."
"They may be. A great many people make the Kirby House their home, and, I am pleased to say, all like it."
"My son is here," replied the short gentleman, "and I want him."

"My daughter is here," said the tall gentleman, "and I want her."

Then the ex-Mayor made the two sit down and talk to him. He learned that they lived in Chicago, were in business there, and not on speaking terms with each other; one had a son, the other. he would sentence them to the peniten-daughter; one had a son, the other a daughter; children loved each other, parents would not give consent, and children came off to Milwaukee and children came off to Milwaukee and married, then wrote to parents and asked for their blessing. Instead of blessing, both parents came on, each to tear his child from the embrace of the other, and take him and her home.

The proprietor saw through the whole thing at a glance now, and wondered not at the anxiety of the parents. He found the couple were at the Kirby, and requesting the two parents to make themselves as comfortable as they could, he paid them a visit. He found them both somewhat frightened as the hour drew near to hear from home, but he found them both sensible people who really them both sensible people, who really loved each other, and who would not have taken the step they did had they not felt it necessary to insure their happiness. He found too, that they were married—tied together strong and fast, and that all the indignant fathers in the world could not untie them; and he concluded that he would not prevent their happiness, even if he could. He talked to the couple, who appeared more than ever frightened when they learned that their parents had really come, and gave them some good advice. Then he came out, to find both men ready to rush in

"Hold on," said he, "you have left this thing to me. You, sir, will go in first," and he directed the short man.

The short man went in. He was gone paced the hall nervously. When the short man came out, he was not half so excited as he was when he went in. He said nothing, however. The tall man paid his visit, but at the end of five minutes came out more excited than ever. The short man stepped up to him and reached out his hand, but the tall man from the son and a few tears from the daughter had worked the repentance.

"It was a scurvy trick you played us," he said; "both of you deserve a whipping, I was an old fool, though to stand in your way, for I might have known you would beat me. I didn't know you loved each other so. You, you young rascal, have got a better wife than you deserve, and if you don't make her happy I'll break every bone in your body; TERMS:

None of the obituaries of Thaddens Stevens which we have read have sketched him faithfully and vividly as looking, somewhat full in the face, and somewhat excited, jump from the cars before they had fairly ceased their motion, and rushed off through the line of hackmen, who were trying to stop him, make off across the Menomonee up town. In a second the observer might have seen another gentleman, not so stout, but considerably taller, leave the cars and follow. Mr. Stevens was a firm believer in future rewards and punishments. When Judge Taney died he remarked that the Judge had doomed himself to eternal infamy by the Dred Scott decision, and hefeared to eternal flames. On one occasion, in animated debate in Congress on the course to be pursued toward the leading rebels, Mr. Stevens exclaimed that he would sentence them to the peniten-chivalrous nature. He held all manner of meanness in infinite contempt. An evidence of this was the spirited letter which he wrote on the occasion of Mr. Buchanan's funeral, expressing himself strongly in favor of every demonstration of respect for the personal, priveta character of his old polit-ical antagonist.

For many years Mr. Stevens appropri-ated a large part of his income to redeeming slaves from bendage. was done without ostentation, and generally without being made known by MILITAR him to any one except the parties concerned.

Mr. Stevens hobbled through life, like Byron, with a lameness occasioned by a deformity of one foot. One of the most disgraceful things in the newspaper literature of the day has been an oceasional unfeeling fling at this defectshowing a much greater moral defect in the person capable of such a meanness.

Mr. Stevens was very fond of playing eards, and frequently sat up very late, and sometemes all night, engaged in this diversion.

He was strictly a temperate man, and never tasted liquor or wine. He lived and died a bachelor; but he was not insensible to the charms and fascinations of woman.
